RUSSIAN LAW IN THE 19th CENTURY

Russia embarked upon the nineteenth century with a new Emperor in a liberal frame of mind determined to modernize the state apparatus and bring order to the chaotic state of Russian legislation. In 1801 the tenth codification commission since Peter I was instituted. The Commission looked initially to Europe for ideas. The works of Jeremy Bentham were translated into Russian and the Code Napoleon was closely followed in preparing the initial drafts. But imposing foreign schemes for systematization did not find favour with Alexander I in the end. Russia would look to her own historical experience and legislation to fashion a new code of law.

Alexander I also introduced a ministerial reform to supplant the collegial model of Peter the Great. Modelled upon the French scheme, the administrative reform was accompanied by an expansion of the education system and a transition to a system of civil service recruitment based on subjects examined; it encompassed natural law, Roman law, private law, criminal law, and the State economy.

Answer the following questions:

1. What were the major advances in the work of the 1801 codification commission?
2. What reforms made by Alexander I supplanted the collegial model of Peter the Great?
3. What are the major features of the Russian legal development of this period?

LAWMAKING IN THE SENATE

Visitors going from the House of Representatives to the Senate are often startled by the difference. The Senate chamber is smaller and quieter than the House chamber. Usually only a few senators attend sessions. The Senate chamber has 100 desks one for each senator facing a raised platform where Senate leaders preside over sessions. The party leaders or their assistants stay in the Senate chamber at all times to keep the work moving and to look after their party's interests.

As in the House, any member of the Senate may introduce a bill. Procedures for moving bills through the Senate, however, are more informal than in the House. Senate leaders control the flow of bills to committees and to the floor for debate and vote. They do this by consulting closely with one another and with other senators.

Senate leaders also try to schedule sessions to fit the interests and needs of as many senators as possible. In contrast to the procedure in the House, individual senators have the power to disrupt work up the Senate for days, and if he allies himself with a few other Senators, he can tie up the Senate for
